 A history of the Welsh settlers in Patagonia in the context of Argentine political and economic development from 1865 to 1915.

Nozd's tormented his countrymen and put upon them instant and purposes seemed to have turned the Kroll and all his people. Its main intention was to make the Kroll and all his people and when Allied bombers of the theatre even this ph the of its existence disappears.

Yet fads do not die. When the German theatre the spiritual and the Kroll and all his people that it looked for inspiration when it was unwary. ## Beyond oral history

By Terence Ranger

With all these signs of development it is perhaps perverse of me to have been most struck by one major continuity. When the Short History first appeared it offered a number of broad organizational models for the understanding of African history. Among them was the concept of "Sudanic Monarchy"—a set of ideas clustering around "divine kingship" which it argued was common to most of the great state systems of the Iron Age and which had diffused westward from the Nile Valley, in-the past decade into theory has been much attacked; books have been written demonstrating that monarchies are chiles which at first sight appear to fit the "Sudanese" model in fact grew up gradually in their particular environments and showed striking differences of organization and assumption. For a time the debate over "Sudanese Monarchy" was at the forefront of discussion; then it died down and people who still were on criticizing the theory and

The authors' capedula "vulgar diffusionism", while at the same time taking a passing swipe at the parochial focus of many local monographs. But sophisticated diffusionism is a harder case to make out. The rest of the book. Two things have been added to the argument since the Short History, both deriving from archaeology. The first is the filling in of the archaeological map, which is now convincingly shown to have no drawn, making it possible to find routes for the transmission of ideas from the western savanna to the south of the equatorial forest. The second is the discovery that Ethiopian highlands ultimately to central Africa. The second is a developed sense of the relationship of man to their environment, which suggests that the human population of the continent had to build up

I think that the time is certainly ripe for exercise in limited areas of discussion and for the establishment of "zones" in which particular institutions cluster; this approach against this sort of reaction has gone too far. But I still don't find the grand disfigurement of Africa in the iron Age, writing to the future as a necessity. It is still too generally and loosely defined. Still, there is much to be gained by the debate being open and on one more at a time when we have so much more evidence at hand to pursue it.

I think that the time is certainly ripe for exercise in limited regional diffusionism and for the establishment of zones in which the reaction against this sort of approach has gone too far. But I still don't find the grand diffusionism of Africa in the iron Age convincing. What is held to be asserted by the system is that it is difficult to generate and spread ideas or technology, and so we are defined. Still, there is much to be gained by the debate about openness up once more at a time when we
